Halloween is rapidly approaching, and this weekend, amidst pumpkin picking, haunted houses and rewatching your favorites, might you entertain a little theatre?

DARK LIGHT, a horror play written by Matt Glaz, ends its run this weekend in the Zoo Theater in Williamsburg, Brooklyn (118 N. 11th St). The production, which excitedly comes with a warning of gruesome images, tells of "Emily, and her little brother, Tim, abducted by a costumed psychopath during a trip to the circus. Waking to find herself imprisoned in an abandoned underground facility, Emily discovers a group of strangers who are also trapped in the depths. As test subjects in a twisted experiment, the group must navigate a living nightmare in which they have no control—while something pulls them, one by one, into the darkness. Now, fighting to rescue her missing brother, Emily must face something even more tormenting than her underground prison as a terrifying new light is shed on a dark past."
